

Separating and worried about your finances? You're not alone

By Perpetual Private Insights

20 September 2020

Separating from your long-term partner is incredibly difficult. Amid the rollercoaster of emotions during the process of separation and divorce, many women suffer a longer-term hit to their confidence and self-esteem. Perpetual's 2020 research study of 3,000 Australians* shows that divorced or separated Australian women are much more likely to be feeling a range of negative emotions than the rest of the population - this includes 27% more likely to feel stressed and 15% more likely to be feeling anxious.

The emotional toll of separation makes it harder to deal with the practical difficulties and complexities that comes from separating two lives. For women who left it to their partner to look after the 'money side of things' during their relationship, making the right financial decisions at this time is a particular challenge.

According to Perpetual Private Senior Financial Adviser Carolyn O'Reilly, many women post separation find themselves confronted with big financial decisions that for the first time need to be made on their own.

"Often in a relationship one party is responsible for more of the financial decision making. This means that many women who are recently separated or divorced may not have previously been in control of their own finances."

Women care more about money and finances, but have less experience

Our research also found an unfair anomaly in men and women's attitudes and experience towards finance and investments. The findings showed that while women are 6% more likely than men to care 'a lot' or 'more than anything' about their finances, they are significantly less likely to feel confident about managing their finances. Some 17% of divorced or separated women say they have 'no confidence' or are 'not particularly confident' in managing their finances compared to 8% of Australians.

Unfortunately, a separation or divorce is just about the worst possible time to take a crash course in finance and investments to gain the confidence and expertise needed to make these important decisions.

Sharon Parker, Lead Partner at Fordham, a specialist part of Perpetual, suggests that women who find themselves in this situation should, as early as possible, seek expert advice to try to understand their financial position:

"It's very hard to go through a relationship breakdown and try to gather financial information at the same time. I think the best way is to find someone you can trust, who is able to translate complex financial information into something you can understand. Then you need to ask really good questions and keep asking them until you understand."

Separated women have the right qualities to take control

The good news for women in this situation is that our research shows divorced and separated women have the right qualities to take charge of their finances. While the timing may be bad, they are more likely than other Australians to have the inner strength and courage (as well as a range of other great qualities) to overcome the personal emotional toll of separation and also make the right financial decisions.

Source: Lembit, G., (2020) 'What do you care about: The personal edition', Perpetual Client Insights and Analytics, released 13 August 2020.

Financial steps to take during and after a separation or divorce

After taking stock of your situation and looking after your immediate financial needs (things like general living expenses and mortgage repayments) Carolyn advises women to put together a budget and to seek financial advice. A budget is crucial, as it's likely that your financial situation will have changed significantly. After that, Carolyn suggests looking at your short, medium-term and long-term financial plans, including any risks that you might be exposed to.

Some areas particularly worth looking at are:

- Your will, estate plan and powers of attorney. Work with a solicitor to make sure they're still fit for purpose.
- Your bank accounts, especially joint accounts and joint credit cards, to decide whether they meet your current and future needs.
- Insurance (life, TPD and income protection). You are likely to need to change it to reflect your new situation.
- Family trusts. If you have a family trust, is this trust still a relevant structure for you? If you don't have a trust, is it something you should consider opening to receive assets as part of the financial settlement? Trusts can both minimise tax and protect assets from future financial exposure.

Find more detail on these financial steps in this article.

Every separation is different – what don't you know?

Of course, these are general guidelines. Every person our advisers and accountants talk to has different needs and will need the advice of different experts. As Carolyn says:

“You can't know what you don't know. Recently, one of my clients, going through a separation also needed to return to work. This meant it was important to consider whether income protection insurance was appropriate. In this case, the client also had dependants and debt so other types of personal insurance were also considered like life, trauma and total and permanent disability insurance.”

Sharon spent time with her client reviewing her whole financial plan, including how her new family unit was going to meet its future income needs, and then longer term looking at how she would manage her finances to meet her retirement. Sharon worked as her client's key accountant and adviser throughout, drawing in other experts, such as a financial adviser and investment specialist, when required. It's this consistent support and expert advice throughout the whole separation process that Sharon says her clients find most valuable:

“A relationship breakdown is emotionally difficult and financially damaging. During a time like this it's important to have a trusted adviser and accountant beside you to guide you through it. You need someone to identify the issues and put together a strategic review and plan which is relevant for your individual circumstances. By engaging an expert, you're not on your own. Your adviser and accountant will help you make informed decisions that are in your best interests.”

Source: Lembit, G., (2020) 'What do you care about: The personal edition', Perpetual Client Insights and Analytics, released 13 August 2020.

Perpetual Philanthropic Services are provided by Perpetual Trustee Company Limited (PTCo), ABN 42 000 001 007, AFSL 236643. This publication has been prepared by PTCo and may contain information contributed by third parties. It contains general information only and is not intended to provide you with advice or take into account your personal objectives, financial situation or needs. The information is believed to be accurate at the time of compilation and is provided by PTCo in good faith. You should consider, with a financial adviser, who can provide you with the relevant Financial Services Guide, whether the information is suitable for your circumstances. To the extent permitted by law, no liability is accepted for any loss or damage because of any reliance on this information. PTCo does not warrant the accuracy or completeness of any wording in this document which was contributed by a third party. Any views expressed in this document are opinions of the author at the time of writing and do not constitute a recommendation to act. Past performance is not indicative of future performance.